Hi John,

I think you misread or misinterpreted my message. I wrote "I'm writing an article ...". This is different from "intending to publish this comment" (to quote your email below), namely it is different from intending to publish the exact words I sent.

For decades, I have sent drafts of my writing to people for comment. The whole idea is to obtain their feedback so I can correct any inaccuracies. When I send drafts for comment, this is not a statement of intention to publish the words exactly as in the draft form. That would defeat the purpose of sending a draft for comment.

I'll send a revised draft anon.

Regards,
Brian

Dear Eli,

Please find attached an email I have just received from the academic supervisor of Judy Wilyman, who you may recall we had dealings with some time ago. He is intending to publish this comment, where he states I made "incorrect and adverse comments" about Judy's research. He is requesting I make comments about this passage. Given that my comments were completely factual and correct, what avenues are available to me to prevent this from being published?

Regards,
John

Hi John,

I'm writing an article about the mobbing of Judy Wilyman. Below is a passage referring to you. Please send any corrections or comments.

Regards,

Brian

John Cunningham, a surgeon, took a special interest in Judy's research on the HPV vaccine. After he inadvertently received the names and email addresses of subscribers to her email list, he sent three messages to senior university figures and selected journalists, with copies to all her subscribers. In two of the messages, he made incorrect and adverse comments about Judy's research. He also sent quite a number of emails to Judy directly, with copies to me and to senior university figures. He posted some of his comments on the SAVN Facebook page.
